Polo GRrounds at 2 o'clock this afternoon, and am hour aft rwards there were 20,000 people in the stands ready to usher in the baseball season of 1912. There was no rush at the gates and little of that exhuberant enthusiasm that usually marks such occasions. The fans, a large majority of whom had bought their tlokets in advance, quietly moved it and took their seats.

While waiting for the sport to begin the immense throng sat around and discussed the one sorrowful subject that is sungrossing the city. This made the blasts from the brass band in front of the grand stand seem strangely out of place.

There is no doubt that the feeling of sadness had a serious effect on the attendance. A haif hour before the game began the bleachers were not filled and there were hundreds of empty seats in the grand stand. Only the reserved sections and dish boxes were fairly well.

The Giants jumped into the lead without heritation and gave the crowd as her till at the start. Devers her of the start in the start. Devers her of the start in the start. Devers her of the start in the start.
